Dr. Lind,

I believe my background brings an unusual combination of experience to the Content Producer position at Lind Plastic Surgery. I have spent more than 30 years producing professional media, and that career has followed the same changes that have transformed how businesses communicate—from broadcast television and traditional production, through Internet video and early social media, to the continuous-content environment that now drives digital marketing.

One of the most relevant parts of that background was more than seven years of production work for Houston Methodist Hospital System through Reel Connection Media. I initially performed that work as a Reel Connection Media employee and later continued as a 1099 production professional working through the company. The work extended across Houston Methodist's 9-campus network and ranged from hospital grand openings, Breast Cancer Awareness programming and community events such as the Houston Marathon to physician and department features. I also worked inside operating rooms documenting delicate surgical procedures and physician explanations, produced interviews ranging from nursing staff through campus leadership, and created content for the Find a Doc website. During the COVID shutdown, I produced virtual department tours for resident candidates who could no longer visit hospital departments in person. My portfolio includes work involving breast surgery, oncology, immunotherapy, cardiac services and other clinical departments.

I have also produced short-form commercial work for other healthcare businesses, including medical spa, spinal care, emergency care and dental clients. That experience is relevant to plastic surgery because the production challenge is not simply documenting a procedure. Specialized information has to become something a prospective patient can understand, remember and trust.

At the other end of the production spectrum, my work with DFS Marketing put me directly into the high-frequency content model that now defines social media. I was producing approximately three pieces of content per day while also supporting the company's broader digital operation. That experience taught me the practical difference between producing a traditional video project and maintaining a continuous publishing cadence.

That combination is what I would bring to Lind. I don't see professional production and daily social publishing as competing objectives. A properly designed production can produce the day's finished piece quickly while also capturing the supporting material that makes the same shoot useful for future content. A physician explanation, for example, can become today's short-form post while the underlying footage, transcript and supporting B-roll remain useful for additional questions, educational material, website content or future campaigns.

I also see an opportunity to apply modern AI-assisted workflows where they actually save production time. I would not begin by adding technology for its own sake. I would first identify where time is being lost in the existing process—reviewing and organizing footage, transcription, content extraction, captions, asset management, scheduling or other repetitive work—and then use automation where it removes those bottlenecks while keeping human judgment around medical information, patient material and final creative decisions.

I am currently in New Braunfels and am actively pursuing a return to the Houston market. I am prepared to relocate for the right opportunity.

My background is not that of someone who began with social media and learned video afterward. It is the reverse: I have spent my career learning how production changes as technology, distribution and client expectations change. I believe that experience can be valuable at Lind because the current challenge is not simply making another post. It is creating a production process that can sustain the volume of content you want while making the footage and expertise behind that content work harder.

I would welcome the opportunity to discuss that with you and show you the Houston Methodist, healthcare, commercial and digital work represented in my portfolio.

John Carr
(713) 899-1776
john@carrmultimedia.com